

DNA Of Your Betters

Fantasy Free Economics, James Quillian

Posted on January 10, 2022 by Fantasy Free Economics

What are some of life's most competitive activities? There are professional sports, pop music, business in general and so on. Is there any reason why an average person with an average of DNA based attributes cannot rise to the top in any and all of competitive fields.

There is no law against trying. Given enough effort is there any reason why Pee Wee Herman couldn't play line backer in the NFL? Perhaps he does not run fast enough. Is he too light? Can he bench press 400 lbs? Is he competitive enough? It takes a lot to qualify as a linebacker in the NFL. What is most necessary here is what is in a person's DNA.

How competitive is the process of becoming the world's richest man?

How competitive is it to become the world's most powerful man or woman?

How competitive are elections of the president and members of congress?

The competition to be top dog on the world stage in any of the above just mentioned positions is almost impossible to even fathom because it is so severe. In truth that kind of competition gets bloody.

What DNA based characteristics would contribute to winning the presidency or a seat in congress? Some describe it as a political personality. A good question is, what is the difference between a political personality and that of a sociopath? Honestly, that is a good question. Is there a difference?