Henry Cuellar:

Sir, I am James Quillian, Author of the Fantasy Free Economics blog. I have a unique perspective on what is developing in the United States in terms of economics and politics.

Both the economy and our political system are going to collapse. This will probably happen prior to the 2020 elections. Since you are the congressman from my district, I am going to offer you some advice as to how to protect yourself and hold on to your seat in congress.

What I recommend to you is that you practice the art of not knowing, when damage to your constituents can no longer be denied.

Your support of the Affordable Care Act is known and well documented. The public is already starting to cite this act as a set of skimming operations designed to benefit all who lobbied for its passage. You must convince your constituents that you had no knowledge of, or any way to know about the actual sinister nature of this bill.

Constituents are coming to understand that the Infrastructure Investment and Jobs Act is just another income transferring spending bill that has a completely negative impact of those who vote for you. You must convince people that you had no idea the bill was as bad as it is.

Folks are also starting to understand that all stimulus, monetary and fiscal simply constitute welfare for the rich. Of course, it must appear that you personally have had no way to know this is the case.

All of these postures require practicing the art of not knowing. Surely you know how to do this. All incumbents do. You have the reputation of being the brightest and most educated lawmaker in Washington. So, in your case, convincing your voters that you didn't know things that are perfectly obvious, will not be that easy. But, being the shrewd politician you are, surely you are up to the task.
